

Three-Layer Storytelling

The knowledge you need to tell a story that compels an audience.

Steve Bryant
Head of Content

Share to Twitter LinkedIn Facebook

To tell stories to other people, you first have to tell the story to yourself.

Sounds simple, but has the benefit of being true – and for everything from sales decks to blog posts to marketing strategies to TV commercials.

That's the first layer of the Three-Layer Storytelling concept: knowing what you want to say.

Everybody appreciates this layer, because everybody has something to say, just as everybody is armed with the business end of a digestive tract.

But stories have listeners, and different types of listeners respond to different types of stories.

The second layer is knowing who your listener is, and what moves them.

This layer is more difficult to appreciate, because it takes effort to understand other people. The payoff, however, is the advantage of knowledge.

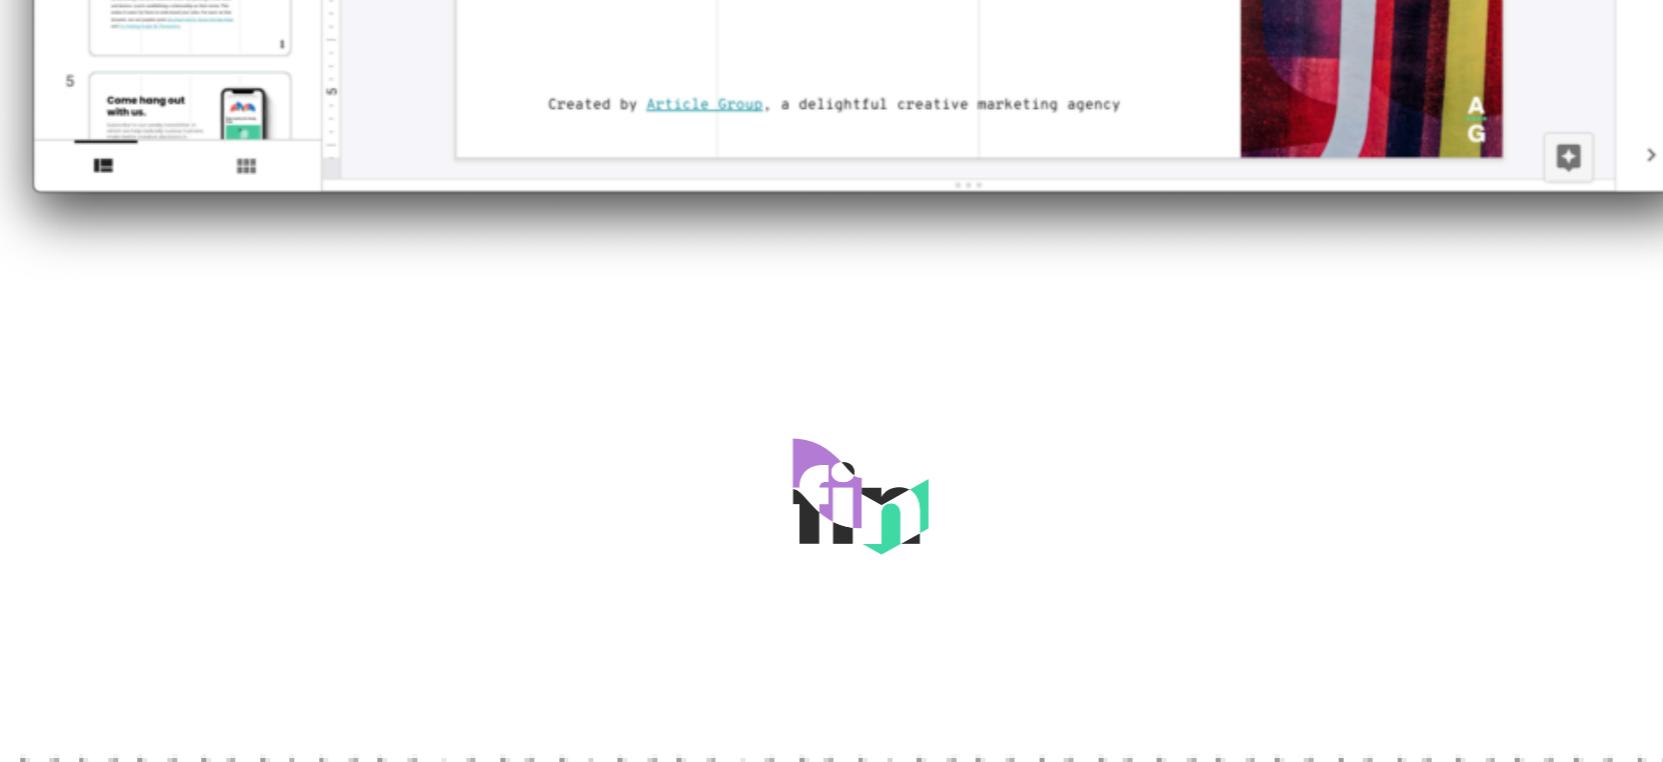

Once you know who you're telling stories to, you can revise your story to meet your listener where they are.

That's the third layer: the crafting of the story to fit the audience.

Few people appreciate this layer. It provides none of the explosive joys of mental flatulence, or the quiet satisfaction of knowledge.

But if you get it right, you'll express yourself through the needs of the audience, and that sets the foundation for a trust. Which, of course, is what every productive relationship is based on.

We invite you to learn more about Three-Layer Storytelling. Just click the graphic below for a free deck to get you started.

Steve Bryant
Head of Content

Steve specializes in content strategy, branded content, product development, and editorial operations. Yes, he'd love to get a drink.

@stevebryant Steve Bryant

Read More

What you need, dear brand, is a point of view

How to make better content decisions and start delighting people already.

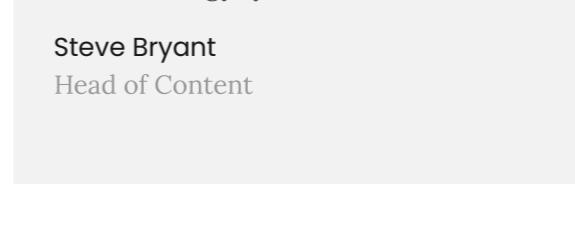

Steve Bryant
Head of Content

Don't persuade. Explain.

Lessons from AWS Re:Invent, explaining super complicated ideas, and avoiding the curse of knowledge.

Steve Bryant
Head of Content

Will WeWork for love

One startup's journey to build an inclusive dating app in the land of casual misogyny.

Steve Bryant
Head of Content